For example, on June 29, Romanian soldiers passing through Dorohoi spread a rumor that the Red Army was following them. Part of the city's population came out to meet the Soviet troops with red flags. Rifle and machine-gun fire was opened on the demonstrators, as a result of which there were many dead and wounded, then a Jewish pogrom took place in the city (State Security Organs of the USSR in the Great Patriotic War. RGVA. F. 33987. Op. 3. D. 1308. L. 116–121. However, Romanian historiography gives somewhat different figures: 51,644 rifles, 1,080 light and 130 heavy machine guns, 4,648 pistols, 36 mortars, 157 guns, 16,270,453 cartridges, 20,878 grenades, 115,138 shells and mines (History of Bessarabia, p. 2 21). Part of this discrepancy can be explained by the fact that we are probably talking about serviceable weapons, but another part of these data is so clearly at odds with the amount of military equipment accepted by the Romanian side that there is no reasonable explanation lends itself.
